

Chapter One

The Lighthouse

It was the kind of evening when the sea seemed to hold its breath. The keeper had lit the lamp an hour before sunset, as he always did, and now he sat by the window with a cup of tea that had long gone cold.

“Is anyone out there?” he asked the empty room, and for a moment he thought the wind answered.